For more than four decades, William Drozdiak has been regarded as one of the most knowledgeable American observers of European affairs. During his tenure as foreign editor of the Washington Post, the newspaper won Pulitzer Prizes for its international reporting on the Israeli–Palestinian conflict and the collapse of the Soviet communist empire.

He also served as the Post’s chief European correspondent, based at various times in Bonn, Berlin, Paris, and Brussels, and covered the Middle East for Time magazine. He later became the founding executive director of the German Marshall Fund’s Transatlantic Center in Brussels and served for ten years as president of the American Council on Germany.

Before becoming a journalist, he played professional basketball in the United States and Europe for seven years. He is currently Global Europe Fellow with the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars; previously with international consulting firm McLarty Associates and the Brookings Institution.
